Dallas ISD to vote on replacement and restoration of its tornado-destroyed schools

Posted by Sumit | January 23, 2020

Dallas ISD is planning to vote and get approval for a plan for the replacement and restoration of its tornado-destroyed schools.

Today, the school board will consider investing $147 million to renovate and revive Thomas Jefferson High School and build a new campus for pre-K to 8th-grade students on the former Cary Middle School site.

In October, tornado EF-3 destroyed two schools. Since then, those students have been attending classes on different campuses.

Walnut Hill Elementary was also damaged by the tornado and the district is planning to combine its students with students from Carey Middle School on the new Pre-K-8 campus. More information on this project will be disclosed soon.